Course Objective	Seminar aims at bringing forth importance of Intellectual Property Rights, including patents, trademarks, and copyrights, play a vital role in the chemistry sector by safeguarding inventions, processes, and discoveries. These rights incentivize investment in research and development, foster innovation, and ensure that inventors and creators are rewarded for their contributions. In chemistry, IPR protection is particularly crucial due to the long development timelines, significant investments, and potential for commercialization.
Course Outcome	Intellectual Property Rights serve as a mechanism to protect these innovations, encouraging further investment in research and facilitating technology transfer and commercialization. From the seminar Responsible innovation in chemistry involving the broader societal and ethical implications of scientific advancements and also respecting intellectual property rights were well understood. How Chemists and researchers have a responsibility to conduct their work ethically, adhere to relevant regulations, and consider the potential impacts of their innovations on the environment, public health, and society as a whole were studied in detail. Collaboration between academia, industry, and policymakers is essential to ensure that innovation is both impactful and sustainable.
